

The Altar of Burnt-offering

This file describes the Altar of Burnt Offering, detailing its construction, significance, and the rituals associated with it.

- Construction and Design: The altar was made of shittim wood, overlaid with brass, and had specific dimensions and features, including horns at the corners, a grate of network, and rings for staves. All its vessels were also made of brass.

- Placement and Sanctification: The altar was placed in the court before the door of the Tabernacle and was sanctified through anointing with holy oil and the blood of sacrifices. It was considered "most holy," and anything that touched it became holy.

- Function and Offerings: The altar was used for burnt offerings, where sacrifices were completely consumed by fire. Only unblemished animals were allowed as offerings. The blood of the sacrifices was applied to the altar's horns and poured at its base.

- Priestly Duties and Support: The priests were responsible for maintaining the fire on the altar and performing the sacrifices. They received a portion of the offerings as their sustenance.

- Symbolic Significance: The altar represented a place of communion with God and atonement for sins. The fire on the altar, which came from God, symbolized His presence and acceptance of the sacrifices.

- Historical and Theological Context: The document references specific instances where the altar was moved or profaned, as well as its role as a type of Christ in the New Testament.
